

Dr. Erin Espinoza DO

Dr. Erin Espinoza DO, is a medical oncology, hematology and internal medicine physician who has always been interested in science. She completed her training at the University of Cincinnati Medical Center and Kansas City University of Medicine and Biosciences, College of Osteopathic Medicine. In medical school, Dr. Espinoza became intrigued by the body's complicated blood system and found fulfillment in working with hematology patients toward a united treatment goal.

As a physician of the Cancer and Blood Institute Dr. Espinoza sees adult patients for the diagnosis and treatment of noncancerous blood disorders which are prone to bleeding and bruising including sickle cell disease. She is also a part of the Center for Hematologic Issues in Pregnancy (CHIP), an obstetric and hematology multidisciplinary team which discusses high risk cases focusing on noncancerous blood disorders.

A native of the greater Cincinnati area, Dr. Espinoza enjoys time with family, being outdoors, gardening, hiking with her husband, and playground time with her little one.
